Attorney accuses Baylor Univ. of viewpoint discrimination

Rusty Pugh  OneNewsNow.com  October 12, 2007

An attorney representing a Baylor University professor whose website was shut down because it promoted intelligent design says the Baptist school is guilty of viewpoint discrimination.

Baylor University electrical and chemical engineering professor Robert J. Marks maintains a website called “Evolutionary Informatics,” which features links to the professor’s personal publications and presentations on intelligent design. But just before the school year began, Baylor shut down the website, claiming Marks had violated university procedure for hosting websites.

Attorney John Gilmore, however, says it had nothing to do with procedures -- he claims Baylor did not like the professor’s intelligent design stance. He is accusing the university of viewpoint discrimination.

"No other website that we're aware of has been shut down at Baylor," says the attorney. "The dean of his engineering department, who is a good man -- but [who] I think had pressure brought to bear on him -- shut down his website without any investigation, without any discussion with my client."

Gilmore says universities claim to represent academic freedom, yet censor a viewpoint they do not agree with. "It's ironic this is happening at the same time that the dictator of Iran gets to speak at Columbia University. It's that sort of mindset; they see nothing inconsistent in having Ahmadinejad speak at Columbia, but [they] shut down Bob Marks' website because they're afraid of I.D. [intelligent design]."

Gilmore claims that Baylor University has a history of trouble with intelligent design and creationism.

Sen. Clinton pushing new multi-billion-dollar retirement entitlement
Attorney accuses Baylor Univ. of viewpoint discrimination
Ohio House okays prayer to open sessions
Bush not revealing who he supports for 2008 GOP nomination
Korean-born Christian returns home after four years in a Chinese prison
'Ten Commandments' survey of Americans: Huh?
Report: Churches have potential for breakthrough missions giving
Ministry leader angry Israel willing to divide Jerusalem in order to appease Palestinians
POLL: Scheduling the 'values voters' bandwagon
Al Gore wins Nobel Peace Prize, Ann Coulter doesn't